NCEES: National Center for Education Statistics

Is participation in extracurricular activities related to students' success in school?

Indicators of successful participation in extracurricular activities in school include consistent attendance, academic achievement, decrease in anxiety and aspirations for continuing education beyond high school. Extracurricular participants reported better attendance than their non-participating classmates--half of them had no unexcused absences from school and half had never skipped a class, compared with one-third and two-fifths of non participants, respectively. Participants were also more likely than nonparticipants to aspire to higher education: two-thirds of participants expected to complete at least a bachelor's degree while about half of nonparticipants expected to do so. It cannot be known from these data, however, whether participation leads to success, successful students are more inclined to participate, or both occur.
